But India Company had a large establishment there, and owing to the restrictions imposed on foreigners at Canton the Portuguese Colony became of more and more importance. With little serious interruption this prosperity continued until the outbreak of the war between Great Britain and China, 1839-41. Macao was then the outlet for a large and important trade and contained numbers of foreign merchants. In May, 1839, the entire British community was removed from Canton to Macao, and the compulsory surrender of the opium demanded by the Chinese Imperial Commissioner Liu, and then came a crisis in the state of the Portuguese colony. The dispute between the Canton Authorities and the British Superintendent of Trade had reached an acute stage, and Macao was threatened, because it had become their refuge. Had the then Governor been stoutly hearted and trusted to England supporting him, Macao might have continued to retain the refugee merchants, and for a long term of years at least, have secured the trade, which soon gravitated to Hongkong, after the British flag was hoisted on the island. From that time the trade of Macao has steadily declined, the only important gleam of returning prosperity having been contributed by the coolie traffic in the cities, a trade which, happily for Portuguese credit, had but a brief existence. There still remained, however, a fair business in tea and a large Chinese trade with the West Coast. The former has, like that of Canton, Amoy, and Swatow, been seriously affected by the competition of the Indian and Ceylon teas, and the latter has declined owing to causes enumerated with great perspicuity by Mr.

HERRIOT. Other sources of revenue and trade have not arisen, save the erection of new monopolies by the Government, which so far from helping the colony are gradually throttling its commerce.

The question then remains, can anything be done to restore to Macao a portion of its vanished trade or to preserve to it what little still lingers there? One of our correspondents writing on the subject uses the term

A CHINESE VIEW OF THE RUSSIAN TRANS-SIBERIAN RAILWAY.
